Accelerometer and gyroscope measurement data from an arbitrary small-amplitude motion is analyzed via nonlinear least squares techniques exploiting kinematic constraints. Both the directional vector and the position of the knee joint axis are determined in the coordinates of both the upper and the lower leg sensor. Simultaneously, the ankle joint position and the hip joint position are determined using slight variations of the very same algorithm.